

Marissa Saretsky.

Chief Sustainability Officer.

“ Sustainability is not only a business responsibility, it represents an enormous opportunity to innovate, future-proof and create value. It is core to the self-care revolution. ”

Marissa Saretsky leads Opella’s social and environmental progress in support of a healthier planet and society. She ensures sustainability is integrated throughout every arm of Opella, and is passionate about driving win-win initiatives that can be felt from the corporate level all the way to the consumer.

She has spent her career driving sustainability progress within the private sector through experiences in-house, consulting, and teaching at the University of California – Berkeley.

Before joining Opella in July 2024, Marissa held the role of VP of Global Sustainability at Pandora, the world's largest jewelry brand. She built and activated a first-time sustainability strategy, team, and governance. Under her leadership, Pandora achieved remarkable milestones, including transitioning all of Pandora’s silver and gold to recycled sources, shifting the business toward lab-grown diamonds made with 100% renewable energy and significantly reducing its carbon footprint.

She received her master's degree in Sustainability from the Institut d'études politiques de Paris (Sciences Po) and her BA in International Relations and French from New York University.

Outside of work Marissa can be found exploring the outdoors and looking for her next tastebud adventure.
